

Women Ending Hunger, a volunteer group of the Rhode Island Community Food Bank, works to create long-term solutions to the problem of hunger. This initiative brings together a diverse group of concerned women who commit their time, talent and resources to advocate for change.

Women Ending Hunger works on many hunger-related issues, including educating the public, advocating for policy change, nutrition education and SNAP (Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, formerly Food Stamps) outreach.

Recent Women Ending Hunger projects include:

- Hosted an advocacy event at the State House which brought the voices of food pantry clients to local legislators through the Paper Plate Campaign.
- Founded the Food Bank's Speakers' Bureau, which raises awareness about the issue of hunger in the community.
- Spearheaded the creation of a local photographic exhibit in collaboration with the national "Witnesses to Hunger" project.
- Assisted Food Bank staff in gathering data for the Feeding America Hunger Study.
- Created Common Sense Cooking, a 12-episode cooking series on PBS, which taught viewers how to prepare well-balanced and nutritious meals on a limited budget.
